Glamour of 1950s and 1960s Jewels

The 1950's enabled women to revel in their femininity and what can be more feminine than well designed jewellery?

In the 1950's, jewellery was intricate and had the wow factor with evening jewellery being particularly popular. Sets of jewellery either demi-parure or parure (a full set of jewellery consisting of necklace, earrings, bracelets and/or brooch) were very popular and particularly suited the ultra feminine style of the era - think nipped in waists with full skirts or the sleeker pencil skirt, heels and classy blouse.

Use of colours such as bright pinks, sapphires blues and an abundance of floral designs emphasised the beauty of the jewellery.

Coming into the 1960's, feminine and beautiful jewellery designs were still in place with the introduction of certain plastics such as Lucite moulded for jewellery design. There was also the introduction of more abstract shapes in jewellery with the 'space age' theme being popular.

Ladylike jewellery i.e. traditional sets consisting of a necklace, earrings, bracelets, brooch or a combination still remained popular.
